Speech by Hon. Henry R. Selden.

On taking the chair to preside over a Liberal meeting recently held in Rochester, N. Y., the Hon. Henry R. Selden spoke

As I participated in the movement which resulted in the Cincinnant Convention, and to some extent in the deliberations of that Convention, it may be expected that I should allude to the reasons, which induced me to join in that movement, and to the objects which I hope to see accomplished by it.

One of the causes which exercised great influence in determining my course, who had feereness with the terroress which had feereness with the terroress which had feereness with the Republican party, was demonsted, who presumed to intimate an opinion favorable to the nomination of any candidate to the Presidency other than the present incumbent. Whenever any unlucky wight chanced to assume such a position, every opprobrious epithet which the English language contains, capable of such application, was, as it were, simultaneously showered upon him. I shall not attempt to repeat the epithets; you will find a full catalogue of them in the files of every Administration newspaper. I say this, not on my own account, for both press and people have treated me with great forbearance, and personally I have nothing to complain of.

It seemed, however, from the reading of the Administration papers, for some time, both before and after the meeting of the Clacimati Convention, as though a new unpardonable sin, not alluded to in the Sacred Record, had been, in these latter days, introduced into the world, consisting of opposition to the re-election of President Grant. These were indications sufficient to teach me, without going to Washington, and without the sid of any investigating committee, that the immense power and patronage of the Federal Government were being made use of to secure the nomination and re-election of President Grant. Whether that in the sufficient of the present days of the part of the Administration was exerting an improper and dangerous influence upon the political affairs of the country. It created a kind of terrorism, not very unlike in its objects, and, in my judgment, little less dangerous, because more insid

There are other and more important sub-jects which fully justified the Cincinnati movement, but they are so well understood that I need no more than allude to them. To one who regards as I do the mainten-To one who regards as I do the maintenance of the appropriate division between the powers of the Federal and State Governments as the most important as it is the tendency toward the absorption by the Federal Government of the powers properly appertaining to the States, could not fail to be alarming. It is difficult to arrive at the truth in regard to the disorders have been increased rather than diminished by arbitrary interference of the General Government; or, if it were not so at first, that it is so now. I firmly believe that the reconciliation of the different races, which is indispensible to the termination of those disorders, will be greatly promoted by the change of admindstration which we seek. recommended Grant's nomination in 1868, and had then subscribed liberally to sid his election; that he had headed the subscription to present Grant with a house in Washington at the close of the war; that he had become socially intimate with Grant and knew him exactly; and the Grant had nominated him for Secretary of the Treasury—added to his acute and unerring financial Judgment—rendered the Grant party eager to array him as the representative of the business men of the country on the side of Grant. The state is the utterance of his emphatic opinion that the continuance of the Grant party in power is more likely to produce a financial revulsion than the success of the country on the side of Grant. The sulf is the utterance of his emphatic opinion that the continuance of the Grant party in power is more likely to produce a financial revulsion than the success of the country on the side of Greely. Though he does not state the reasons on which this opinion is based, so the summed up thus:

1. The financial danger of postponing Reconciliation between the North and the South.

2. The financial danger of postponing Reconciliation between the North and the South.

3. The financial danger to all other American securities of allowing the State bonds of the carper-bag States to be is suited in the virtual repudiation of several of them, and which threaten soon to end in the open repudiation of several of the mail.

I have not spoken especially of the candidates, and without trespassing upon your patience, can do little more than allude to them now. That Mr. Greeley is a man of greating tellect and great heart need not be stated to any andience in this country. I could add nothing to the knowledge which the world possesses on the subject. His honesty was never questioned even by his bitterest endings. Compassionate by nature, and always the friend of the slave, and from circumstances which I have not time to detail, possessing to a greater extent than any other prominent man with similar sympathies, the confidence of the late slave owners, I believe him as well qualified as any man who could be placed at the head of the Government, to accomplish the most important work which now demands its attention, the restoration of order and prosperity in the Southern States, to be accomplished, I apprehend, rather by the withdrawal of ill-directed efforts, than by the exercise of power, and by encourage ment rather than repression.

General Grant has rendered to the country great services, and is entitled to its gratitude, and I do not intend to do or say anything, if it were possible, to dim the lustre of his fame. But does gratitude require his relection to the office he now holds? Has he not been well rewarded for his services, great though they were? The nation has for four years bestowed wealth and honors not only upon him, but upon all his relations, lineal and collateral, if not to the third and fourth generation, at least to the second and third. I do not conplain of these rewards on the contrary, assuming them to be worthing bestowed, I rejoice at them; but it does not appear to me that gratitude requires the continuance of the shower for another four years.

A. T. Stewart on Financial Crisis.

Mr. A. T. Stewart, the most successful merchant in the world, and who to our positive knowledge, has subscribed to the campaign fund to aid the election of Horace Greeley, denies, through a New York paper, that he ever said that the election is intended to promote; though a candidate for Vice-President is under no full from the continuance of the Grant and more likely to result from the continuance of the Grant aparty in power. The fact that he had recommended Grant's nomination in 1868, and had then subscribed liberally to aid his election; that he had headed the war; that he had become socially intimate with Grant and knew him exactly; that Grant had nominated him for Secretary and the secretary and the secretary of the Treasury—added to his acute that the form the propersion is the continuance, or in the activation of the principles whereupon he is apported, or of the measures which his election; the measures which his clearly to result from the continuance of the Grant with a financial panic is much more likely to result from the continuance of the Grant with a party in power. What Befel Two Trojan Dressmakers.

Two of the leading dressmakers of this city took it into their heads, about a month ago, to go over to Europe, and make arrangements for getting the fashions at the earliest possible moment. Each had an eye on the other: each intended to get clear ahead of the other. Neither of them knew that the other was intending to go abroad. As rivals sometimes do, even if they are women, these two hated each other. They had not spoken to each other for years, though they had now and then spoken of each other. They engaged passage by a first-class steamer that sailed about two weeks ago. Each knew that she was to have a companion in her stateroom, but did not know who she would be, and was probably somewhat anxious on this point. Truth is stranger Two of the leading dressmakers of this that she was to have a companion in her stateroom, but did not know who she would be, and was probably somewhat anxious on this point. Truth is stranger than fiction. The steamer sailed proudly down the bay. One of our dressmakers was on deck enjoying the scene, which was novel to her. She was delighted that she had outwitted her rival up in Troy. Presently she went down to her stateroom to see what sort of a room-mate she had. On entering the room she found her rival. Both ladies threw up their hands, exclaimed. "You here!" and both fainted.

This excited suspicion, and the matter was investigated. Both ladies were found insensible. The Caplain was heard to remark to the second officer, an hour afterward, that he'd be blessed if he ever saw anybody get seasick so quick as those two women did. Our reporter, from whom we learned these facts by a special cable dispatch, says it was the most comical sight he ever saw to see the second officer.
